Introduction:

America's criminal justice system should be fair and equitable, however, its many flaws have led it to be the opposite. The criminal justice system often results in discrimination rooted in race and socioeconomic status; White, wealthier individuals have open access to the necessary resources needed for societal persistence, while those less fortunate are tossed into an inequitable institution. This, combined with the educational disparities faced by inner-city constituents, sets off a domino effect that contributes to the rise of incarceration rates and magnifies the systemic disadvantages faced by marginalized communities. In Cleveland, Ohio, these issues are especially pronounced, highlighting the systemic failures that disproportionately affect marginalized communities.

The topics of police brutality, the treatment of incarcerated individuals, recidivism, and the lack of education surrounding these subjects are all-encompassing and contribute to the overall social reform. Through this capstone, our goal is to highlight issues with a focus on Cleveland, Ohio to help aid in creating a more fair and equitable criminal justice system. By addressing these challenges, we aim to advocate for reforms that actively work to protect and aid citizens who are at a high risk of incarceration from being negatively affected by our current system.

Historical Context:

Federal

The historical realities of criminal justice reform at the federal level in the U.S. are deeply tied to broader social, political, and economic changes. During the early 20th century, the Progressive Era saw the beginnings of reforms focused on rehabilitation over punishment, such as establishing juvenile courts. The establishment of the first juvenile court had such great influence that, “between 1899 and 1925, every state established a separate juvenile court for dealing with youth charged with crimes” (Dawson, 1990; Davis et al., 2008/The National Academies Press). The Progressive Era also prioritized rehabilitation over punishment, introduced the probation systems, and called for sentencing reforms to aid in individualizing punishment.

The successes of the reforms during the Progressive era continued their influence into the mid-century reforms, which were largely driven by civil rights movements and the push for federal intervention in addressing systemic racial injustices. Landmark legislation such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964 aimed to combat racial discrimination in policing and the judiciary by empowering the federal government to enforce civil rights protections more effectively. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 called for systemic reform of discrimination in employment, public facilities, education, law enforcement, and voting. The 1960s also saw the establishment of the President’s Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, which aimed to conduct a current study on American policing to find practical ways to lower crime and strengthen the rule of law (U.S. Department of Justice).

However, criminal justice policies shifted toward punitive measures in the latter half of the century. The “tough on crime” Conservative agenda, catalyzed by then-President Ronald Reagan, led to policies such as the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention, which included mandatory minimum sentences and expanded federal involvement in drug-related crimes (National Institutes of Health). The War on Drugs brought many long-term disservices to the development of minority communities, and these effects are still being mitigated by lawmakers today. The consequences of the harsher policies for nonviolent drug crimes disproportionately targeted marginalized communities and perpetuated systemic inequalities. Recently, demands for equitable restitution for the victims of unjust conservative drug policies have intensified, with federal initiatives such as the First Step Act of 2018 aiming to mitigate sentencing disparities, enhance police accountability, and prioritize rehabilitative strategies. This evolving landscape reflects a bipartisan acknowledgment of the urgent need for a more impartial justice system.

State

A considerable number of people are released from Ohio's correctional facilities annually, with more than 18,000 incarcerated individuals released from prisons and around 75,000 from jails in 2022 alone. These citizens face trouble when securing housing, employment, and healthcare, when embarking on the reentry process, causing recidivism rates to increase. Ohio has currently established significant criminal justice reforms over the past few years, attempting to find a balance to resolve conflicts like reducing recidivism, incorporating educational classes for incarcerated individuals and law enforcement that highlight societal reentry, and continuous efforts to stop the discrimination of individuals by their race or socioeconomic status.

In 2011, Governor Kasich signed sentencing reform legislation allowing judges to sentence non-violent fourth and fifth degree felons to community-based facilities instead of prison. This expanded the inmates' credit system and held immediate releases for those who had served 80% of their sentence. Despite these efforts, critics have argued that this progress has been undermined by a lack of funding for community-based alternatives and diligent efforts to address racial inequalities in sentencing and incarceration. Furthermore, Ohio reached new chapters within its justice policies by signing Senate Bill 288. SB 288 works to make the criminal record expungement process easier, improve reentry programs for newly released prisoners, and award credits to potentially reduce prison sentences. The Reentry Task Force, established in April of 2023 by the Supreme Court of Ohio, works to expand reentry courts, revisit housing policies to remove barriers for formerly incarcerated people, and join the “Clean Slate Initiative” to expunge records for eligible offenses.

Racial and socioeconomic disparities continue to hinder Ohio’s progress involving Criminal Justice Reform. Based on 1,132 drug-related cases, a study conducted by Professor Kat Albrecht of Georgia State University alleged racial disparities in sentencing by Pickaway County Court’s Judge, P. Randall Knece, concluded the following:

“The analyses conducted for this report consistently find that Black and white defendants have differing case outcomes for the analyzed drug cases. Black defendants are more likely to be sentenced to incarceration and less likely to receive alternative sanctions even when considering types of charges, types of drugs, and presence of a prior felony.”

According to the Sentencing Project and nationwide evidence, Ohio’s black residents are imprisoned at 6 times the rate of White residents; sentences for Black men average 19% longer than similarly situated White men. These inequalities highlight the need for systemic reforms to ensure equal treatment across the board for all people in sentencing. While educational training has been implemented, systemic biases, extending access to educational programs, and making sure these reentry support systems properly serve incarcerated individuals are going to be its biggest challenges. In order for these issues to begin resolving in Ohio, the state needs to make strong approaches, ensuring evidence-based solutions will work in everyone’s favor.

Local

Cleveland’s criminal justice system has gained nationwide attention, particularly following the tragic killing of 12-year-old Tamir Rice on November 22, 2014. Tamir was shot by police officers while playing with a realistic toy gun. The officers were responding to a high-priority call and were not informed that the gun might be fake and that the suspect was a child. Within two seconds of arriving at the scene, the police officers shot Tamir in the abdomen. The police, without assessing the situation or allowing Tamir an opportunity to explain himself, resorted to violence and used guns to solve the situation. Tamir’s shooting emphasizes, “... how police see Black boys as more dangerous than they are...” (Bennet 2020). This incident was marked by a “series of miscommunications, tactical errors, and institutional failures by the Cleveland police that cascaded into one irreversible mistake” (Dewan and Oppel Jr., 2015). It underscores failings in police communication, de-escalation tactics, and the issue of systemic racism.

In 2014, the U.S. The Department of Justice (DOJ) conducted an investigation into the Cleveland Division of Police (CDP) after numerous complaints of excessive force. This investigation concluded that “there is reasonable cause to believe that CDP engages in a pattern or practice of using unreasonable force in violation of the Fourth Amendment” (United States Department of Justice, 2014). To address these issues, the DOJ and the City of Cleveland entered into a Consent Decree ,which led to the creation of the Cleveland Community Police Commission (CPC). The CPC works to bring community involvement within police reform, strengthen accountability, and rebuild broken trust between the CDP and its residents. Other key reforms included new use-of-force policies and de-escalation training. While these initiatives have been promising, trust remains fragile between the CDP and the Cleveland community.

Reentering society in Cleveland, Ohio, presents significant challenges for formerly incarcerated individuals, such as barriers to employment, housing, and social reintegration. According to a report by the Ohio Justice & Policy Center, “Formerly incarcerated individuals face an unemployment rate nearly five times higher than the general population,” making financial stability a daunting prospect (OJPC, 2022). Programs like the North Star Reentry Resource Center and the Cuyahoga County Reentry and Reintegration Program (REEP) in Cleveland aim to bridge this gap by providing job training, counseling, and support, but the looming presence of a criminal record still limits opportunities for structured employment and stable housing, often leading to cycles of recidivism (North Star Reentry Resource Center, 2023).

Comprehensive reform is essential to address these interconnected issues: police brutality, inadequate law enforcement (lack of training, staffing shortages, challenges maintaining community trust), and opportunity obstacles. Increased funding for expanded diversion programs and enhanced systems of accountability are essential. Cleveland's challenges show the dire need for change, but they also highlight the work the city has started to reform into a fair and equitable criminal justice system.

Implementation Plan:

Overview of Implementation Plan

Implementation Plan Outline

Our implementation plan is a phased approach combining reform, education, advocacy, and policy change. It is rooted in the idea that education is essential and ignorance remains a key barrier to progress. Through Beyond Bars Initiative, a non-profit organization that targets incarcerated citizens who are close to their release, as well as law enforcement programs and officials, our organization will work to launch educational workshops and toolkits for these groups that touch on a variety of different life skills. Through donations, sponsors, government funding, and grants (The Cleveland Foundation, United Way of Greater Cleveland, The Gates Foundation, etc.), our proposed non-profit organization will acquire the money needed to efficiently provide our resources to those in need.

We will begin by creating educational toolkits that supply incarcerated persons with essential life skills. Helpful resources may include available felon-friendly employment openings, housing opportunities (Habitat for Humanity), constituent support (Congresswoman Brown's Team), and substance abuse support groups/activities. The reentry workshops will be held inside prisons, as a part of a 8-10 week program that features a curriculum that covers a variety of societal skills. These specific topics include employability, financial literacy, anger management, substance abuse, personal responsibility, driver responsibility, parenting, relationship maintenance, advocacy, and basic literacy. In addition to supporting incarcerated citizens, we will cultivate a variety of training programs (workshops and toolkits) for law enforcement that focus on improving de-escalation and restorative justice approaches.

We aim to reduce recidivism and improve reintegration by ensuring that incarcerated individuals feel more connected to their society and have access to coping strategies and resources. Additionally, social media outreach will allow us to raise awareness about this crucial issue and mobilize a more comprehensive movement for criminal justice reform. Lastly, collaboration with stakeholders, including policymakers, community organizations, and advocacy groups will allow us to amplify our impact, reaching further than the Cleveland community and to the state. Our approach ensures both immediate actions, starting with direct education and improved reintegration efforts, as well as a lasting call for extensive policy change to advance to a more just and navigable criminal justice system. This plan was selected through careful thought and deliberation over the most effective way to ensure justice for incarcerated individuals while addressing the broader needs of the Cleveland community.

Communications Plan

Our intention is to promote our non-profit organization through social media, in collaboration with local influencers, organizations, and foundations that focus on criminal justice reform and the reduction of recidivism rates in Cleveland. Through the use of social media platforms such as Instagram,

Twitter/X, Facebook, Youtube Ads, and LinkedIn, our campaign will reach many generations from a technological standpoint. Through email chains with other non-profit organizations within law enforcement, our organization will foster connections with local prisons. We plan to engage with local news outlets to highlight the goals and objectives of our organization, while also participating in public events such as town hall meetings and business seminars to increase visibility. Passing out flyers that underscore the mission of our non-profit will provide extra support for our cause and call further attention to the issues that plague our neighborhoods.

Our primary target: incarcerated individuals who are preparing to reenter society, their families, and community organizations that support rehabilitation. We also plan to target policymakers, potential donors, and employers who can provide opportunities for individuals who complete the program. By building strong relationships with these groups, we will create a network of support that fosters successful reintegration efforts and reduces recidivism. Our collaborations with local businesses and government agencies will allow us to ensure program graduates have access to stable employment and essential resources. We aim to raise awareness for the struggles that incarcerated people encounter when returning to life outside of prison, promoting the idea of second chances.

Stakeholder Analysis

The Cleveland community contains a diverse variety of stakeholders, including elected officials, law enforcement, advocacy organizations, and most importantly, impacted community members. Policymakers, such as Cleveland City Council members and state legislators, play a crucial role in enacting reforms related to bail policies, policing practices, and rehabilitation programs. Law enforcement agencies are also crucial to reforming the criminal justice system since these individuals carry out any changes made within the system. Additionally, Cleveland is rich in many advocacy groups, such as the Ohio Justice & Policy Center and ACLU of Ohio, which provide legal expertise and community mobilization to push for systemic change. To engage these stakeholders, a multifaceted approach is essential. Roundtable discussions and town halls will foster dialogue between policymakers, community leaders, and impacted individuals, ensuring that reforms are rooted in lived experiences. Public awareness campaigns and media partnerships will help educate citizens and apply healthy pressure on lawmakers to prioritize justice system reform. By implementing a combination of grassroots activism, legislative advocacy, and public education, we can create sustainable and equitable reforms that address Cleveland's most pressing challenges.

We would like to extend our heartfelt thanks to Councilman Richard Starr of Ward 5, whose unwavering commitment to justice has made a profound impact on Cleveland's criminal justice system. By using his position on the bench to actively understand the causes of community violence, Councilman Starr exemplifies what it means to lead with both leadership and compassion. Additionally, we are so grateful to have been able to work with Myesha Watkins, Executive Director of the Cleveland Peacemakers Alliance, for her tireless work in violence prevention and community empowerment. Her dedication has helped countless individuals find hope and support to grow and thrive. Mashaun Ali Hendricks, another one of our stakeholders, and restorative justice expert, who has championed restorative justice and fostering spaces for healing and connection. His belief in the power of community-led peace circles reminds us that real justice begins with understanding and empathy. Lastly, we would like to thank Kathryn Terrell, program director at the Cleveland Foundation, whose work with advocacy and strategic efforts have helped drive reforms in the criminal justice system. Each one of our stakeholders plays a vital role in building a more just, compassionate, and restored Cleveland.

Timeline

May 17th, 2025:

- Present our capstone presentation and implementation plan at the stakeholder event. This plan represents our goals and processes for creating our non-profit: Beyond Bars Initiative.
- At the capstone presentation event, we will gather the contact information of those that may be interested in sponsoring, funding, or donating to the upstart of Beyond Bars Initiative (BBI).

June - September 2025:

- After acquiring sponsors and stakeholders, we will establish our organization, by advocating and raising awareness for our mission through social media campaigns and small-business seminars/conferences.
- Our team will coordinate with prisons, law enforcement officials, and restorative justice leaders to facilitate reintegration workshops that allow incarcerated individuals to participate in cultivating basic life skills, while also producing life-skills toolkits that can be distributed to prisons/halfway houses in Cleveland.
- While cultivating these resources, our organization will create additional toolkits and booklets that highlight de-escalation and restorative justice tactics/programs for law enforcement.

November - December 2025:

- After instituting the Beyond Bars Initiative, we will embark on the long process of applying to become a licensed non-profit organization. We could either apply independently, or apply by branching off from a national non-profit.

SWOT Analysis:

Strengths

The strengths of our implementation plan include its focus on education, mental health support, and creating a compassionate community. By developing tailored toolkits, the plan allows for incarcerated individuals to have a sequential process to make their transition back into society much easier and navigable. Furthermore, addressing mental health recognizes the significant role of well-being in both preventing recidivism and aiding the reintegration process. Social media and local events to connect with the community allow people to develop relationships with other previously incarcerated individuals, allowing them to feel connected in their struggles. The creation of this compassionate environment reduces individuals' likelihood of returning to criminal activities. Moreover, collaborating with local stakeholders allows the reach of this implementation plan to be amplified and creates a much larger network in which significant change can be enacted. One important aspect to note includes advocating for and aligning our goal with supportive legislation, such as the Second Chance Act and the First Step Act that enhance the plan's effectiveness. These federal laws fund reentry programs, support mental health and job training, and improve prison conditions. By effectively aligning our goals with these laws, we can ensure that there is systemic support at the policy level.

Weaknesses

Though we are committed to cultivating an implementation plan that is structurally secure, there are some evident weaknesses that our ambition imposes. Education is the biggest resource provided by Beyond Bars Initiative, however, it is also the biggest caveat. Courses and curriculum may undergo harsh standardization processes; the current administration is working overtime to place restrictions on what can and cannot be distributed through the education system. Additionally, consistent engagement from program members, facilitators and institutional stakeholders could be a possible issue; individuals may show signs of disinterest or hesitation. Resistance from policymakers, typically rooted in political agendas or personal opposition, further complicates our ability to expand access and drive reform.

Opportunities

Our implementation plan highlights the cooperation of bright and ambitious young minds. By leveraging innovative ideas and strategic partnerships with our stakeholders, we aim to create lasting change in the lives of incarcerated individuals and the broader Cleveland community. Our approach fosters collaboration between students, non-profit organizations, and elected officials, ensuring fresh perspectives and forward-thinking solutions drive meaningful progress. Through advocacy and outreach, we strive to build a more just and rehabilitative system and be a testament to the power of young leaders for social change.

To strengthen our implementation plan, it is important to enhance outreach efforts and expand partnerships through our connections to activists in the area. Having the opportunity to meet with Councilman Starr or Mashaun Ali Hendricks, who play pivotal roles in the reform of Cleveland's justice system, will expand our efforts to a larger demographic and also allow our implementation plan to take into account the nuances of their positions. Solving generational deficits in the fairness of our justice system is by no means a one-step plan. Therefore, to make our plan stronger, we must gather as much input from leaders as possible to fully account for factors that perpetuate injustices. A long-term goal for our team is to establish a non-profit organization aimed to support incarceration centers in implementing more rehabilitation/reentry programs to prevent recidivism. Our implementation plan needs funding for us to start this non-profit, and also the connections to people who are familiar with the process to help us get on our feet.

Threats

The possible threats that can be posed from our implementation plan includes possible resistance from law enforcement officials in regards to skeptical restorative justice approaches. Additionally, there could be a lack of sustainable funding from grants and private donations to invigorate Beyond Bars Initiative (BBI) which we'll heavily depend on as a non-profit operation. Opposition could arise from political groups that advocate for the status quo of the current, harsh criminal justice policies placed on recently incarcerated individuals set to be released into society after their due time. Also, with shifts being done in government funding, economic downturns could happen, or even political leadership over our cities, states, and country can change which will impact the state of funding and grants being available for organizations like ours.

Beyond Bars Initiative's success is dependent on securing consistent funding to create our educational toolkits, workshops, and anything else needed for our programs. Building strong relationships with both incarcerated individuals, their families, and law enforcement also have a significant part in our plan coming to fruition. We'll also have to rely on effective social media outreach, and the ability to adapt and grow around the evolving community needs and policy landscapes of the city.

Conclusion:

While intended to be fair, America's criminal justice system often perpetuates racial and socioeconomic disparities. In Cleveland, Ohio, these inconsistencies are magnified by issues such as police brutality, inadequate treatment of incarcerated individuals, and educational inequalities. By the implantation of Beyond Bars Initiative, our non-profit organization that strives to raise awareness about these issues, we aim to reduce recidivism and improve reintegration within our Cleveland communities. Through the resources we provide such as educational toolkits and workshops that aid both incarcerated citizens and law enforcement officials, Beyond Bars Initiative can promote lasting, meaningful change. Social media campaigns, stakeholder events, and advocacy forums are ways we will further publicize our resources. Receiving helpful assistance from local restorative justice activists like Councilman Richard Starr, Myesha Watkins, and Kathryn Terrell, we can create important connections that help drive our mission. Our capstone is dedicated to spotlighting these systemic failures, while advocating for meaningful reforms that actively promote equity and protect those most vulnerable to incarceration.
